Photo from our x-ray room at the equine clinic. Annalill adjusts the large, ceiling-mounted x-ray machine in order to take a photo of one of the horse's stifle joints. Image processing is digital, which makes it easier to email the x-ray images for quick assessment by an orthopaedist or other specialist, invaluable as urgent decisions are sometimes required!

Jenni is clipping the claws of one of our patients. Not all animals appreciate having a manicure, and it can sometimes be difficult for the owner to do this at home. We can help, and if needed we can administer a sedative.

One of the most enjoyable jobs of the day: take the ultrasound machine, drive to Holmsunds Tropikhus and hunt for baby lizards! This one is a blue-tongued skink lizard; just one of many interesting and exciting species that can be seen.

Anne is one of the vets who work at our equine clinic. Here she is carrying out a so-called flexion test on a horse - the legs are flexed, after which the horse is trotted off. The test is carried out in the course of a lameness investigation, but it is also included in inspections before a horse is sold or exported. A vet can do quite a bit of body-building during a working day!

Here is another of our talented summer employees, temporary vet Hanna Lindén who works at our small animal clinic! Here she is monitoring the administration of an anaesthetic to a fine Indian rose-ringed parakeet that came in to have a blood sample taken at the veterinary station in Vännäs.

A sweet little Samoyed puppy being x-rayed before the plaster cast is changed to ensure everything is in place. Puppies need to have their plaster casts changed more often than adult dogs because they outgrow their “package”. Anna-Karin is taking the x-ray.

Our small animal clinic mainly treats dogs and cats, but other animals are of course welcome. Today, this beautiful African grey parrot, which was anaesthetised prior to x-rays and blood samples being taken. Birds easily become stressed when handled during a visit to the vet; they usually feel best if they are allowed to sleep through the procedure! Sofie checks the anaesthetic and makes sure the bird is stable.

Some patients weigh a tonne, others a hectogramme. It's a good thing there's magnifying equipment at hand!
